Katsuta Toshihiko WASHINGTON
 – The oil spill off the southern U.S. Gulf of Mexico the worst in U.S. history, almost overlapping that Atlantic bluefin tuna spawning waters of a large number of Japanese imports, such as the Stanford study found. This period was also overlap with spawning season. Atlantic bluefin tuna from the Gulf of Mexico has pointed out in danger of extinction and are concerned about the impact.

In collaboration with the U.S. Univ. Davis, published professional papers on U.S. science magazine published by Swan 28.

Atlantic bluefin tuna are divided into groups to group spawn in the Gulf of Mexico to spawn in the Mediterranean. The latter three each year come to stroll in the Gulf of Mexico in June. The research team, including records and yellowfin tuna catch in the fishery, when records were analyzed with a tracking device to capture the tuna migration.

As a result, the migration of bluefin tuna were concentrated in two areas of the bay somewhat lower temperature. The northeast area overlaps with areas that are particularly widespread oil migration peak-flow was started 4 May.

Bluefin tuna to spawn near the surface. The possibility of the death of eggs and larvae are drifting oil slick, eggs are worried about the influence of drugs and encourage the degradation of crude oil to contain small oil droplets.
